NGOs rapport with communities is what allows them to draw on local knowledge and what makes them capable of responding flexibly and rapidly to communities' needs.

Susan Willis

Member of Ballyjamesduff Community Council

“When communities change with numbers of migrants, refugees or people coming from various cultures to live with us, the NGO is probably the first person to be trusted. They’re not wearing any political badge, they’re not in any way financially motivated to work with those people. They generally are the person that’s out there working just for the good of their community.”
